Abstract

In Mean Spirit, Solar Storms, and Power, Linda Hogan uses the absence, and mystery to articulate the oppression and marginalization of Native Americans. Specifically, because of the environmental crises that inform each novel, the project benefits from ecocriticism, ecofeminism, and ecopsychology. Also, because of various interpretations that open up when silence is deconstructed strengthen the thesis. Ultimately, Hogan's concept of silence as a form of tyranny to silence as a form of reconnection. As characters discover pathways to native traditions, they also discover connections with the biosphere. The movement from silence as a form of oppression to silence as healing to silence as a means of reconnection with the environment ensures the natives' healing and survival. This abstract discusses the overview of the project, illustrates my thesis regarding silence, absence, and mystery, and outlines my critical methodology.

chapter, I detail specific references to ecocritical, ecofeminist, deconstructive texts that I use to analyze Hogan's novels. Begin to discuss Mean Spirit, which is based on a true story involving the people during the 1920s in Oklahoma. In Chapter Three, I examine how Hogan's use of silence, absence, and mystery in the story returns to her birthplace and reconnects with her tribe and then to her home. Chapter Four features my close reading of Power, which is blended with ecological and ethical conflicts taking place in rural Oklahoma. Chapter Five concludes the thesis and reasserts my argument that silence, absence, and mystery illuminates the conflicts in her culture and ultimately serves to clear a space for healing and survival.
