Abstract

Self-help home ownership is today regarded as the only possible “solution”™ to the housing crisis. In the painful process of accepting this reality, most authorities have failed to notice the situation of the tenant population. They have also failed to ask whether ownership is either feasible or desirable for this vast mass of people. Based on research in three Mexican cities, the paper examines the nature of the residential transition, the socio-economic characteristics of tenants and owners, and the nature of urban change. It concludes with some policy recommendations, particularly the need for governments to work towards creating a better balance of residential choices for the poor. Cities need both rental accommodation and the option of home ownership.
