To the memory of Jack Winkler, who set an example by taking a political stand without sacrificing scholarly standards

Those of us who work on the first manifestations of what is now known as feminism are always reading feminism in time. As we study the works and the careers of writers from earlier periods, we constantly attempt to evaluate the extent to which it is valid to interpret their projects from our vantage point. We have to ask ourselves in particular whether our reconstructions of their alliances and commitments—reconstructions that are essential to understanding the history of any inherently political phenomenon such as feminism—are colored by our knowledge of the ways in which feminism has developed in recent decades.

Reading feminism in time thus involves a sort of superimposition of historical moments. In the example I will present in these pages, I step back from my situation today to describe and interrogate a moment at the turn of the twentieth century. At that time, the circle of writers who were creating the French movement known today as "Sapho 1900" produced commentary whose implications were felt far beyond the ir coterie. Sapho 1900's readings of the poet of Lesbos proposed a radical revision of the accepted view of Sappho's sexuality. The significance of that revision for what we know as gender studies and the history of sexuality would surely seem evident to scholars today. Less evident is the role it seems to have played at an important origin of the field of inquiry now referred to as Jewish studies. Less evident still is the way in which that revision came to be used as a sign of political commitment. [End Page 149] One of the principal functions of reading feminism in time is to call attention to such less evident connections.

Doing so is, of course, something of a risky business. Absolute confirmation of the existence of intellectual configurations at earlier periods is hard to come by, particularly when the political connotations of such a configuration would have been undesirable for some of its members. Who can imagine, for example, that respected scholars of antiquity would admit to sharing an agenda with avowed lesbians whose bohemian antics scandalized turn-of-the-century Paris? In the absence of what is usually accepted as proof, we have to work with scattered clues. In this case, my clues are widely varied, ranging from editions of Sappho to earrings. Nevertheless, they are enough to convince me of the existence of what might have been termed, later in the century and on the western side of the Atlantic, a rainbow coalition, whose members were united by their belief in pacifism and their opposition to German militarism. Reading feminism in time, despite its risks, gives us our only access to corners of history that the official record of disciplines has always obscured.

If I wanted to pay homage to classic French cinema, this essay would be titled "The Earrings of Natalie Clifford Barney." ^ After spending more years than I care to calculate working on Sappho's reception through the ages, I thought that my file on her was at last definitively closed. Then, on a visit to the Musée des Arts Décoratifs in Paris, I was mesmerized by the most splendid Lalique jewels I had ever seen. I happened to note that all my favorites had been the possessions of Natalie Clifford Barney, poet and cofounder of Sapho 1900. This meant that they had undoubtedly been chosen by the movement's self-proclaimed new Sappho, Renée Vivien, whose lavish presents to Barney during their long relationship received much comment. Had my eyes wandered no farther down the cards identifying the objects, I would have felt only fond memories for work past. But then I also realized that the jewels had been given to the museum by a certain "Madame Dreyfus-Barney." ^ Suddenly, the file was no longer...
