Chinese and British troops fought shoulder to shoulder against the Japanese at Yenangyaung, Burma, in mid-April 1942. The histories of the two nations, however, record the Yenangyaung battle and appraise the Chinese contribution in starkly different ways. This article seeks to establish the truth through reconciling the significant discrepancies in existence for seven decades, materials of various countries have been studied. This article will present the following conclusions from this forensic inquiry: i) the narrative of the Yenangyaung battle, as told by the commanding officer of the British-Chinese joint forces in the battle, is fraught with misrepresentations; and ii) the

in denying the Chinese rescue of the British troops.
