Book chapter : International tourism: identity and change. 1995 pp.205-223 ref.7

Abstract : This chapter has two main aims: to unearth all the arguments put forward by different anthropologists to distinguish their role and practices from those of tourists, and then to reject these arguments. It suggests that anthropologists' definition of themselves as sophisticated compared with other travellers is one more example of how different types of tourist distance themselves from each other. Anthropologists may embarrassing and emerge from their encounters with them feeling that the than tourists, have more authentic experiences, are less harmful than touri but the stark fact is that in many areas anthropologists and tourists now lite each other.
