Abstract:

Given the proliferation of online groups and growth in distance learning, there is a pressing need to develop best teaching group work online. The following paper explores the implementation of an asynchronous role-play exercise in online undergraduate classes about group work. The overall purposes were to help students learn about group work through participating in an experiential exercise and further develop their knowledge about online groups. Their students' reflections on their online role-play experience are discussed, considerations regarding the complex nature of online groups are explored, educational benefits and related challenges are analyzed, and guidelines are presented to facilitate implementing an online role-play exercise.
