On being African and Reformed? Towards an African Reformed theology interlocution of those on the margins of society

RS Tshaka

Abstract

This article was first given as an inaugural lecture. As such, it sets out a particular agenda for the research being African and Reformed are interrogated. The research notes that these notions are rarely used in notions tend to pick up different meanings as they evolve, so these notions are especially seen in that which in the South African academic circles had become enveloped in the Reformed identity, is here for Africanness. This is considered significant, especially in a context where the Christian faith is seen to be The article challenges attempts at explaining what Africanness mean as a front to perpetuate a status quo thought much of Africa and or Africanness. The author argues that the African Reformed Christian must be an outsider in Reformed theological discourses.
