A Transvestite Boy and a HypothesisRalph R. Greenson

I have been treating the son of the patient whom Stoller describes in his presentation. This is a case still in treatment. I must also explain that this is the first child I have ever attempted to treat analytically and I am not sure that my method of treatment would meet with the approval of the child. Nevertheless, the clinical material is unusually interesting and the simultaneous analysis of the mother added dimension for study. Stoller and I work independently and only reported our findings to one another before the Congress. In this paper I discuss the first fourteen months of treatment, during which time I am seeing the boy four times weekly, have seen his mother about once a month, and his father on two occasions.

Historical Data

The pertinent history given by the parents before the Gender Identity Research Committee (a research project being conducted at the Department of Psychiatry, UCLA School of Medicine, with Stoller as Chairman) is as follows: Besides Lance, 5, they have a daughter some six years older. Their main reason for seeking help for Lance was his compulsion to wear his mother's or sister's clothes. This had begun when Lance was a little over one year old. He seemed to want to put on his sister's or mother's shoes. He very quickly seemed to be above all to walk around in his mother's high-heeled shoes and wept furiously when she tried to remove them. Since he seemed remarkably adept at this and since he was so young and looked so 'cute' he was permitted to continue doing this.
