( )	Joyce learned much about Buddhism when he read the Buddhist Catechism in the Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man . Ulysses and Buddhist Oriental pacifism were concepts that interested him around World War I. He appears to have been interested in these ideas from his early days. This paper aims to discuss how he attempted to absorb all kinds of religious ideas, many in his texts. In 1903, Joyce wrote a review of the Buddhist Catechism, in which he conveyed a romantic view of Buddhism as a "wise passive philosophy" and sympathized with Buddhist pacifism. One major source of Joyce's Buddhist interest was the Buddhist Catechism (1881). Joyce's copy of the book remained popular and authoritative as a Buddhist handbook because it preaches Buddhist pacifism. There are numerous allusions to Buddhism in Joyce's Trieste works, especially Ulysses and Finnegans Wake . Blavatsky's Isis Unveiled mainly.
