Abstract

This research investigates the professional trajectory of merchant South Carolina. The goal is to show that southern commerce is more than what has been claimed in the current scholarship, which focuses on discussions of northern merchants. This has been done by examining Directories from 1790 to 1819 and tracking individual merchants before, during, and after being merchants, and their addresses through the Quantitatively examining the data compiled shows a complex middling commerce that is absent in scholarship on Early Republic South. Showing this level of dynamism illustrates the importance of southern middling commerce in Early Republic America. It is this research on middling merchants that is vital for a full understanding of trade in the Early Republic.
