Abstract:

The objective of this paper is to identify the structural impossibility within the potential for designing our everyday words, the goal is to make a case - through a discussion of active citizenship during the era of globalised capitalism - the necessity of the existence of unregulated islands of design activity. The paper tries to show why focusing on everyday for life - should be of much greater importance than it is now. It also shows that in order to achieve this goal, design needs all those whose ordinary acts are overlooked today but are already happening in everyday life and market domination. The task of design lies in recognising and empowering each of us. Consequently, the role of the key builders of our environment - lies not only in redesigning the environment in order for it to ensure the empowerment of individuals, but also in establishing the conditions for creating and encouraging new functional thinking.
