Abstract or Summary	Informed by feminist and queer theories, this thesis provides an alternate reading of selected narratives from the Hindu epic “Mahabharata”. By queering the narratives from the epic, this thesis highlights the existence of fluid notions of sexuality and gender present within Hindu religious texts. In doing so, the study aims to nuance the dominant ideas on gender and sexuality held by Hindu society in Nepal to better understand both heteronormative and queer practices. This study also offers some reflections on how a queer feminist interpretation of Hindu religious texts such as Mahabharata can be used to subvert the heteronormativity present in Hindu socio-religious discourse.

Informed by feminist and queer theories, this thesis provides an alternate reading of selected narratives from the Hindu epic "Mahabharata". By queering the narratives from the epic, this thesis highlights the existence of fluid notions of sexuality and gender present within Hindu religious texts. In doing so, the study aims to nuance the dominant ideas on gender and sexuality held by Hindu society in Nepal to better understand both heteronormative and queer practices. This study also offers some reflections on how a queer feminist interpretation of Hindu religious texts such as Mahabharata can be used to subvert the heteronormativity present in Hindu socio-religious discourse.
