Abstract:

Coinciding with the 50th anniversary of the science fiction/fantasy TV series Doctor Who (1963-1986, 1996, 2005) to marry, renew vows, and engage in civil partnerships during a mass Doctor Who-themed wedding in London. Who fandom as a case study, I explore how fans are able to construct, define, and maintain their identity in wedding meaning they ascribe to objects present in the wedding performance. By using the concept of weddings as performance I describe how fans are able to tell the story of their experience and identification with fandom, but because not with fandom, fans must communicate this narrative in a highly selective manner, choosing details that both satiate fans and make sense to a diverse audience of fans and nonfans alike. In doing so, fans are negotiating this identity heteronormative structure of wedding culture. The presence of the wedding ceremony reveals that fan identity despite seeming subversive to mainstream, are actually influenced and shaped by these traditional spaces and r
