Although much recent scholarship has sought to challenge it, the belief that all white feminists of the “second wave” era of the 1960s and 1970s were blind to their own privileges and ignored racism, classism, and homophobia has seemingly held fast, despite astute and persuasive corrections to the historical record. The persistence of this particular narrative has been politically emboldening to the next generation of feminist activists who have used the perceived errors of the past to launch their own feminism. Clark A. Pomerleau's study of Califia Community—a women-only, feminist educational organization formed in 1975 in southern California—contests the idea that the white feminists of this era ignored their own privileges and were unable to form multiracial alliances, instead presenting a portrait of a group of activists committed to the radical education of all women, regardless of gender expression, sexual orientation, socioeconomic...
