Audio Description (AD) is a modality of audiovisual translation that consists of making cultural products accessible to blind or partially-sighted. Our study focuses on the contrastive analysis of the AD of four films in English and Spanish to determine how the same visual cultural reference is described in two languages and for two target cultures. Using a methodology, we categorise and analyse cultural references following Díaz Cintas and Remael's (2007) classification of translation strategies used. Our research shows that the decisions that the describer makes are conditioned by the geographical but above all cultural, that exists between the audience and the culture that is reflected in the film. The mediator between cultures; that is why the greater the cultural distance, the higher their presence and involvement.
