Abstract:

In the last three or four decades, environmentalists have made us aware of industrial civilization's often harmful impact on the natural world. However, these warnings have only rarely led to any really significant, pro-environmental change in the difference in how we treat the environment. Ecopsychology is a new area of psychological study and practice which uses established psychological principles to help us understand our tendency to destroy the environment, and to help us change our behavior in ways that allow us to live more responsibly, harmoniously, and sustainably in the world. This paper explores the more prominent ecopsychological perspectives and critiques them from a Christian point of view. A Christian perspective that is in harmony with Christian theology is required.
