Abstract

This review examines and critiques recent research on masculinity ideology and masculine role conflict. First, definitions, models, and instrumentation are addressed, and then research regarding the psychosocial, biomedical, and multicultural correlates of masculinity ideology and masculine role conflict are examined. In addition, use of professional healthcare services by men and professional biases against men are discussed. In reviewing this body of research, three major criticisms are discussed: the use of inappropriate instruments, limited sampling, and research paradigm fixation. Solutions are proposed for particular methodological problems, and recommendations are made for further research.
