Abstract

On August 24, 1814, during the War of 1812, British troops were in the American capital, Washington City. Inside of the Executive Mansion, Dolley Madison, was gathering items to be rescued in the event should advance into the capital. Following the American defeat at Bladensburg, American General John Armstrong ordered a retreat resulting in the final exodus of Washington City. As she was leaving the Executive Mansion, Dolley Madison decided the Gilbert Stuart portrait of George Washington also needed to be saved, and according to letters she wrote, the portrait was removed and passed to two New Yorkers who had stopped to watch the removal of the portrait resulted in an anecdote, a short story of her behavior, that has been published in numerous forms throughout the nineteenth, and twenty-first centuries. It was a narrative spread throughout the country following the burning of Washington, a narrative corrected by the slaves present in the Executive Mansion at the time the portrait was removed. Each narrative published in textbooks. Each of these narratives will be compared and contrasting their similarities and differences, as well as the date of their publication.
