In an effort to raise interest in the subject of Islam's ritual legal material, I discuss here the strengths and weaknesses of Sunni Islamic purity law (taharah). In light of these studies, I investigate the degree to which theories and models from anthropology and comparative religion may be said to shed light on Islamic ritual law and practice. As—to varying degrees—authors contest the theories of cultural anthropologist Mary Douglas, special attention is paid to her work. My own approach proceeds cautiously, an awareness of anthropological approaches and cross-cultural data, such as that proposed by anthropologists, and an understanding (the uniqueness of) Islamic ritual law; and that there are wide-ranging benefits for students of Islamic religion in doing just this.
