Abstract:

This manuscript provides suggestions for utilizing historical atlases in teaching social studies. These instructions help students in exploring territorial conflicts, in tracing the geographical expansion of a country and studying the effect on population growth when land is added. Students should construct acetate overlays for use on the overhead projector when studying the expansion of the United States. Young people can be helped to gain an appreciation of the scope of history from atlases as they study atlases, and to see that change is omnipresent and persistent both at home and abroad.
