On 7 July 1923 eight students and one professor from the University of Delaware sailed from New York to France aboard the Rochambeau. These men were the first participants in the Delaware Foreign Study Plan, a new program whereby undergraduates lived with French families and took classes at French universities under the close supervision of the American professor, for which they earned a full year's academic credit (Figure 1). Two years later, in 1925, thirty-two students and a professor from Smith College (all women) made a similar journey as part of the pioneering Smith College Junior Year in France (Figure 2). Whereas the Smith College program accepted only Smith students, the Delaware Plan admitted and even recruited students, including women, from other colleges and universities after its first year. By 1939 the two programs had...
