Abstract

On buses, trains, and streets over the past decade and more, you tune into their personal stereos and tune out city sounds. Why? And to urban culture more generally? Does it heighten reality? Combat boredom? Far too commonplace and enduring to be become a potent artefact symbolizing contemporary urban life: the auditory experience of self and place. In doing so, it enhances the quality of life in everyday life. Urban, cultural and anthropological studies drawing upon notions of visuality. But culture always has an behaviour -- perhaps nowhere more so than in the city where visual approaches to culture by proposing an auditory under of personal stereo use. The author reformulates our understa central experiences of the urban, such as space, place, time ar
