Abstract

This dissertation forms a study on material culture from the background of social archaeology, which focuses on the gaming stones of Vouppes, a Late Bronze Age production settlement at the foothills of the Troodos Massif. Primary artefacts were discovered on the site during several seasons of survey and excavation, carried out under the direction of the author. The dissertation demonstrates how such an aspect of material culture can be used to assist in an understanding of a gaming stones context and possible function in Arediou will be examined and compared to the use of gaming stones at Cypriot sites. My aim is to tell the past and in so doing challenge the predominantly anonymous narrative of prehistory. Ultimately my intention is to remove the so-called 'faceless blobs' of prehistory (Tringham 1991: 94), a narrative that ignores human beings, in so doing giving rightful consideration to the highly complex social dimensions of the past.
