Abstract

As a result of the Hanoverian victory at the Battle of Culloden, the Highlands changed forever. Parliament passed new legislation that altered many elements of traditional Highland culture. Highland landlords implemented new economic schemes to convert subsistence farming into commercial agriculture. With the economic changes in leases, land management and the social structure would be reorganized. One particular strategy that affected the tacksmen, would find their traditional cultural role as an economic role as an estate manager stripped from them, resulting in a significant change in Highland society. This thesis will explain the multiple causes and economic factors that lead to mass emigration from the Highlands to North America. This link traces these massive changes occurring in the Highlands to the emigration of the tacksmen class.
