The purpose of the present study was to determine whether a reading intervention targeting issues related to anxiety and attachment has any effect specifically at the beginning of a new school year. A sample of 100 years who attended a university-based preschool was examined. Teacher questionnaires that assessed childhood anxiety and attachment were administered before and after the treatment. The children were split into three groups: control, reading, and reading with illustrations. They read two books that focused on the theme of coping with anxiety. There were no group differences after the treatment, a main effect for time on teacher-rated attachment, teacher-rated anxiety, and teacher-rated attachment. That no evidence was found for the treatment playing a role in attachment, the passage of time did seem to play a role. Further research with larger sample sizes that also involve more extensive interventions is needed in order to more fully examine the potential for positive effects of reading on preschool-aged children.
